Category:Wireless networking Category:Computing input devicesEmerging cardiovascular trends in hepatobiliary and pancreatic disease. Given the complexity of the diseases under review, it is not surprising that so many common perinatal problems arise in these disorders, which themselves are often inherited. Thus, more general perinatal morbidities are at risk for recurrent or even secondary liver and pancreatic disease in addition to the current risk of developing the primary neoplasia. Hepatobiliary disease is increasing in prevalence due to an improved general level of health care. Maternal and fetal care will become even more critical as time progresses as the pregnancy and childbirth are prolonged and as previously symptomatic disease is discovered. This is a general overview of the most recent literature on this topic. The traditional perspective of paediatric hepatology has been unchanged by the general application of the internet in the last 2 decades. However, newer trends will emerge as it becomes clear that prenatal diagnosis will be increasingly important. On the other hand, hepatological education has become increasingly dynamic and tailored to the needs of family medicine and other specialties. A team of appropriate specialists-pediatricians, hepatologists, geneticists, pathologists-must be in place to address the special needs of the fetuses and neonates with these conditions
